The "Daveno" as a Bed

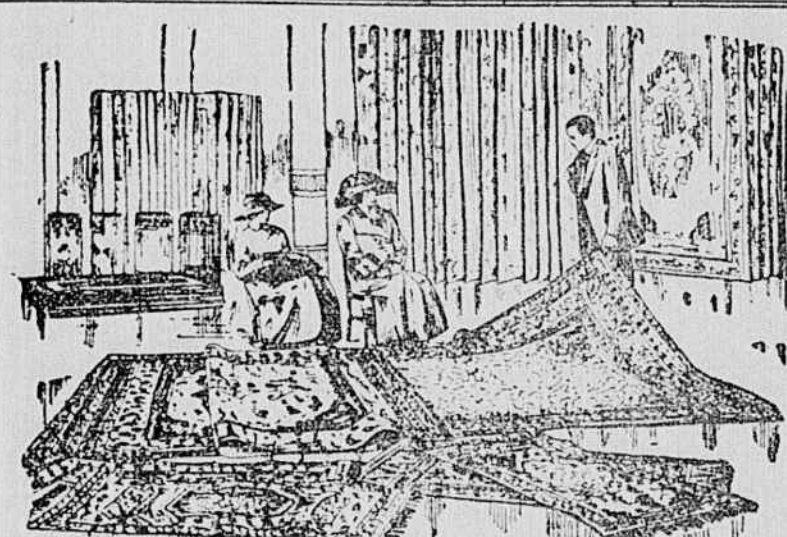

The "Daveno," when open, is an actual full size metal bed with a set of springs entirely independent of the Davenport itself. Mattress, sheets, comforts and pillows are enclosed beneath the seat, with no suggestion whatever of their being present. To use as a bed, just open, turn back the covers and retire in absolute comfort.

The "Daveno" as a Davenport

The beautiful designs in which these luxurious Davenports are constructed make it a very valuable addition to any home. When closed it is absolutely impossible to tell that a bed is connected with it in any way. In fact, the same manufacturers make the Daveno and a straight Davenport in the same design, and without attempting to open them no one can tell the difference between the two. It is in appearance an actual davenport.

THIS DEPARTMENT has the same careful attention to details of your requirements as we give to the furniture of your home. That means satisfactory service and dependable quality.

EXPLAINS ATTITUDE IN REGARD TO CLAIMS

Emperor William's Son-in-Law Gives Satisfactory Statement of Position.

BY LA MARQUISE DE FONTENAY.

EMPEROR WILLIAM'S son-in-law, Duke Ernest Augustus of Brunswick, on receiving a commission in the Prussian crack Hussar Regiment now stationed at Rathenow, took the oath of loyalty and obedience to the crown of Prussia, which is exacted of every officer of the Prussian army. Subsequently, in a letter dated April 20, addressed to the Chancellor of the German empire, regarding his attitude in connection with the claims of his father to the Hanoverian crown, he indicated that his position was plainly indicated by the fact that in his oath as a Prussian officer he had pledged himself "to do nothing, and to give his support to nothing, that was destined to alter the territorial integrity of the kingdom of Prussia." On the same occasion the Chancellor received a letter from the young duke's father, namely, the Duke of Cumberland, in which he renounced his rights to the throne of Brunswick, in favor of his surviving son.

The Kaiser, his Chancellor, and the members of the Federal Council representing the score of sovereign states comprised in the confederation known as the German empire, were satisfied with this declaration of the young duke, and all arrangements were made for his taking possession of the ducal throne of Brunswick, of which he is the lawful and acknowledged heir, this month. In fact, he was to have made his solemn entry into Brunswick as sovereign next week with his consort, and, in view thereof Duke John Albert of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, who has been exercising the regency of Brunswick for several years past, had broken up his household at Brunswick, and dismissed all his retainers there since the 1st of October.

The complication which has now ensued is not of the making of the Kaiser, of the young Duke of Brunswick, nor of his father, nor yet of the Federal Council. Indeed, the Kaiser's sympathies are with his son-in-law. In order to understand the real situation, it is necessary to explain that there has been ever since the annexation of Hanover by Prussia, at the conclusion of the War of 1866, a party in the Imperial Parliament known as the Guelph party, which claimed to represent the nationalist aspirations of the former kingdom of Hanover, and which, by lending its support first to one faction and then to another, faction in the Reichstag, was able to give a good deal of legislative trouble to the government.

The members of this party in Parliament realized that all their importance as a political factor was in danger of disappearance through this dynastic alliance between the former reigning house of Hanover and that of Hohenzollern. They did everything they could to prevent the marriage, or which they did not hesitate to express their disapproval, and since then have been rendering themselves more objectionable than ever in Parliament to the government, insisting that neither the old Duke of Cumberland nor his son, the young Duke of Brunswick, had ever renounced the claim of the renunciation of their claims to the crown of Hanover.

Now the Duke of Cumberland cannot make any such renunciation, being bound by a most solemn vow to his dying father, the blind ex-King George of Hanover, in 1878, never to surrender his rights to the throne of Hanover. His position has been thoroughly understood by the Kaiser and the other sovereign princes of Germany, all the more as he has pledged his support to the German empire as now constituted. The Guelph party, therefore, in announcing that they will not abandon their warfare in Parliament upon the government, as long as the prince whom they regard as their lawful sovereign, namely, the Duke of Cumberland, does not renounce his claims to the Hanoverian throne, know perfectly well that he cannot make any such declaration.

They also declare that they must have an equally explicit renunciation by the young Duke of Brunswick, before they can attach any importance to his oath of fealty to the crown of Prussia, which he gave on joining the Prussian Hussar Regiment in which he is serving as captain.

On the strength of these assertions and aggressive attitude by the Guelph members of the Reichstag, the German press demands a specific and additional act of renunciation, if not by the Duke of Cumberland, at any rate by his son, so as to put the Guelph party out of business. The Kaiser's son-in-law regards this demand upon him as an insult, since it implies that the oath which he gave on receiving his commission as a Prussian officer is unworthy of belief. Moreover, while he is perfectly prepared to live up to that oath, he does not wish to publicly repudiate not the Guelph party in Parliament—but all those many Hanoverians who, holding aloof from politics, still retain affection and friendship for their former dynasty.

It is, therefore, easy to understand why the Kaiser, as well as his sons, also the Chancellor, and all the sovereign princes of the German confederation, should sympathize with the young Duke of Brunswick in the present imbroglio. Of course, it is difficult to predict what will take place; but there is much reason to believe that the Federal Council will ignore both popular clamor and the Guelph party, and will authorize the young duke to take possession of his throne of Brunswick, without any further act of renunciation.

Lord Gullford, whose beautiful country seat, Waldershare Park, near Dover, in Kent, has just been entirely destroyed by fire, is descended from the second Earl of Gullford, who, as Lord North, was that Prime Minister of George III., to whose reactionary policy the British empire is indebted for the loss of those American colonies which are now comprised in the United States. In fact, Waldershare Park was the principal home of that statesman, of whom Burke wrote: "He was a man of admirable parts, of general knowledge, of a versatile understanding, fitted for every sort of business, of indolent wit and pleasantry, of a delightful temper, and of a mind most disinterested." The barony of North has since been alienated from the house, owing to the fact that it is heritable in the female line, and went on the death of the ninth Lord North and the third Earl of Gullford, to his daughter by Susan Countess of North, to her son by Colonel the right Hon. John Doyle, that son being now known as the present and eleventh Lord North.

But the present Earl of Gullford's eldest son is also known as Lord North, for the sake of convenience, and in order to distinguish him from his father. As a general rule, the eldest sons of earls, marquesses and dukes make use of the second title of their father until they succeed to the main title. But as the Earl of Gullford's second title is the barony of Gullford, if his son were to make use thereof, there would be two Lords Gullford in the same family. One would imagine that it would be better for him to be mistaken for his father than for a distant kinsman, especially in view of the fact that young Lord North has no real right to style himself Lord North. This is what may be described as one of the anomalies of the English peerage.

The late Earl of Gullford was killed while riding in the Windsor steeplechases, in the same way as the late Lord Rosemary. The founder of the North family was Sir Edward North, a famous lawyer, who was Lord Chief Justice of England in the reign of "Bloody" Mary; and the second Lord North, his son, was the ambassador of Queen Elizabeth to France, and the treasurer of her household. The younger son of the fourth Lord North was Lord Chief Justice of England, and Lord High Chancellor, in the reign of Charles II.; and his grandson, the third Lord North, was advanced to the barony of North from his cousin.

The present Lord Gullford is not very rich, and, as a rule, Waldershare Park is let to strangers. Recently it has been leased to the Earl of Shrewsbury's eldest son and heir, Lord Ingestr. But Lord Gullford seems to have been occupying the place when it was burned down, and to have taken a very active part in restoring the historic treasures with which it is crowded from cellar to garret at Trinity College a few months ago.

ATHLETICS SCORED BY BISHOP KILGO

Conditions in American Colleges To-Day He Declares a National Scandal.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.] Durham, N. C., October 11.—"Athletics in American colleges today are a national scandal," declared Bishop John C. Kilgo in a chapel address to the students of Trinity College a few months ago.

The college athletic question has been talked about to a great extent here this year, and it has gained considerable prominence. Trinity College takes a stand against the athletic policies existing in many of the colleges of the State. The climax of this question was reached here Wednesday when Bishop Kilgo denounced the colleges and universities of this country in plain English for their attitude toward athletics.

"College authorities have been and are justified in encouraging healthy sports in the colleges; but, inch by inch and foot by foot, corruption has come in, until now the college community represents a winter resort for athletes rather than a place where thinkers gather in pursuance of knowledge.

of students whose chief aim in college is athletic achievements. The State University's Alumni Association contributed more to athletics last year than to all other departments of the institution combined.

"Students seem to have no idea of honor; they sell their services in the student market. There is a student market to-day just as much as there is any kind of market. There is a market for athletics in the summer, just as there is a market for tobacco in the fall.

"At Trinity College the authorities will always grant athletics the proper consideration and the proper encouragement, but Trinity has a right to make, and every man has a right to make."

agreement, but Trinity has a right to make, and every man has a right to make."

CAUGHT UNDER AUTOMOBILE.

Suffolk, Va., October 11.—A. T. Nordfash, of Suffolk, and C. D. Slocum, of Goldsboro, N. C., had a narrow escape from serious injury yesterday when the driving rod of the automobile they were driving broke and the car turned turtle, pinning the men underneath. The car turned over in such a manner that both Slocum and Nordfash crawled out, not even sustaining a scratch. Sheriff A. H. Baker, who was coming in just after them, brought them into Suffolk.
